Federal Communications Commission
445 12th Street SW
Washington, DC 20554

To Whom It May Concern:

As an agency of the federal government, it is the Federal Communications Commission's responsibility to regulate on behalf of the consumer, the public for whom the agency serves, not large corporations and their shareholders. With that mission in mind, it is imperative that the FCC keep in place current rules to protect net neutrality. This is a vital public safeguard for freedom of speech and open access to information.

Corporate interests cannot and should not be trusted to protect a free and open internet.

I urge you to keep the existing net neutrality rules in place.

Sincerely,

Erik Brown
